Fancy Hill is a fieldstone, two and one-half storey, three bay house with a single, flush end chimney centered on the west gable. The (original) principal entrance, with (originally) a transom, is in the easterly bay of the south front; above the present principal entrance, in the same bay, on the north side, a window at mid-storey height marks the stair landing inside. Earge, rough stone lintels support masonry above the 6/6 windows. Extensive two storey frame additions extend east and west, and a one storey frame dining room addition covers the south front. All the additions date from the 20th century, but they reflect the very traditional early 19th century styling of the main house.

A side hall, with an open staircase, with landings, extending clear to the finished third storey, extends through the house at the east end. The slim round poplar rail is supported by slim turned newels and plain square balusters. West of the hall is a single room on each floor. The mantel in the first storey is approximately contemporary with, but not original to, the house; the second storey mantel, with its engaged columns of the Doric order, with exaggerated entasis, is said to be original. Other trim, including corner-block architraves and six panel doors with shallow raises, appears original, all characteristic of ca. 1825.

In the unfinished cellar, a wood lintel supports the fireplace hearths.

Immediately northeast of the house is a one storey square stone smoke house with a high pyramidal roof, retaining its original, interesting framing, including diagonally crossed beams at the plate level.

An early photograph from the north shows a wood two storey east wing, the roof outline of which can be seen on the stone east gable. Neither a west wing nor window openings on the stone west wall are apparent in the photograph.
